Teaching And Academic Resources

Today is the 50th anniversary of Earth Day and there are many ways to share the celebration with your students this week.

One of the most comprehensive sites, Colorado Virtual Library, has climate stories, and music for you to use in the classroom. There are links to National Park Services, NASA, and many other informative resources.

The National Museum of Natural History has Earth Day webinars in the coming days. Tomorrow there is “Neanderthal Mystery” and on Friday there will be “Fossil Friday.” More information is available here. Scroll down to find links to recorded programs.

Communicating With Members

Both CEA and NEA communicate with members via their home email. If we don't have your home email in our database, they aren't able to communicate with you. If we don't already have it, please send us your home email address.

For Families

CNN and Sesame Street are hosting a town hall Saturday, April 25 at 7 a.m. focused on kids and parents that will address “education, anxiety, screen time and playdates.” Big Bird will be one of the moderators, and various Sesame Street characters will join with experts to answer questions. If you would like to send in a question, use this link.

For Your Pleasure And Health

In celebration of Earth Day, try to get outside, even if only for a while, today. You can take a walk, go for a bike ride, or clean out a flowerbed. This article has suggestions on not only outdoor activities but also virtual Earth Day celebrations you might enjoy.

Here is John Denver singing in celebration of Earth Day.

Finally, it turns out that hugging trees is actually good for your health. Happy Earth Day!
